Topic of the Month: Senioritis: What is it? How do you avoid it?

According to the College Board, when senior year rolls around, some students want to complete their college applications and then relax before they head off to a post-secondary school, the military, or a full time job. Taking it easy may seem enticing, but it is likely to do more harm than good. Seniors should continue to develop study skills, time management skills, and organizational skills needed to be successful at the post-secondary level. In addition seniors need to pay attention to senior year grades. Many college admissions officers pay close attention to senior year grades. Several college applications require you to list your senior year courses. Several college applications also include a mid-year grade report which your counselor will complete in late January. Further, according to the College Board, many college acceptance letters include warnings such as “admission is contingent on your continued successful performance.” This means that colleges have the right to deny you admission should your grades drop significantly. (This information is taken from <http://www.collegeboard.com/student>)

How do you avoid senioritis? 1) Maintain a challenging course load, 2) Set academic goals for your senior year, 3) Stay active in school activities, 4) Volunteer in the community.
